While you're waiting for Adobe to optimize Photoshop, there is at least one thing to keep you busy and that's the new Look Development feature, which allows designers to use the pre-defined presets to import images and adjust advanced text and shapes. As you may have guessed, the Informative Notifications feature is an example of how feature evolution dynamically interacts with user behaviour. This particular feature is nothing new, but its interface has been significantly updated, and is now a simple tool for people with multiple projects. Besides notifications, one of the interesting things about this release is the new block browser and how it works. I have already mentioned that this feature is mostly for getting developers on board quickly, but it is also useful, especially for people who have multiple image databases. With this feature, we design a brand new folder layout that is mobile friendly and puts projects in a much more prominent position. When analyzing results in Photoshop, one can quickly identify what was done and which variant was used. In the past, the only way of doing this was with a shift-F keyboard combination. The feature also provides a shortcut overlay so that the image can quickly be associated with a project. That is not all, of course, as some of the new features are not as noticeable as they should be. For example, compared to the operation speed and flexibility of Photoshop, built-in filters remain unchanged. I believe that Adobe has done a very good job in that regard and I am pretty sure that the features will be updated shortly. What's more, there has been a lot of talk about Motion Blur, which will most definitely be added to Photoshop.
